

Aggregator of Switch Channel Partners

Article Overview

Switch channel partner aggregation combines multiple physical ports into a single logical link to increase bandwidth, provide redundancy, and optimize traffic flow using protocols like LACP, PAgP, and vendor-specific implementations.

Overview of Port Aggregation

Port aggregation, also known as link aggregation, EtherChannel, or port-channeling, is the process of combining two or more physical switch ports into a single logical interface. This allows traffic to be load-balanced across multiple links, increases overall bandwidth, and provides resiliency in case one link fails. Aggregation is typically configured between neighboring switches or between a switch and a network device such as a firewall or server.

Key Protocols

- LACP (Link Aggregation Control Protocol): An IEEE 802.3ad standard that dynamically negotiates link aggregation between devices. LACP ensures that if a port fails, traffic is automatically redistributed across remaining active ports.
- PAgP (Port Aggregation Protocol): A Cisco proprietary protocol that forms EtherChannels by exchanging PAgP packets between compatible ports. PAgP supports modes like auto (passive) and desirable (active negotiation) to establish aggregation.
- Static Aggregation: Links can also be manually grouped without negotiation, which is supported on many switches but lacks dynamic failover negotiation
